IBM's TOP FIVE TECH BETS FOR NEXT FIVE YEARS

- Small amounts of energy created by actions like people walking or water moving through pipes will be captured, stored in batteries and used to power things like phones, cars or homes.
- There will be no more passwords as increasingly powerful phones and sensors will store your personal biometric information, enabling machines to automatically know you are who you say you are.

- Better sensors on and inside the human brain will allow for mental control of objects.
- Powerful mobile devices, capable of precise language translation, will belong to 80% of world's population. The real breakthrough will be ubiquitous voice recognition and translation capabilities, which will make the phones highly useful to large populations who are illiterate, or who have languages that aren't easily written with keypads.
- Much the way powerful mobile devices store your biometric information and translate your language personalized information filters and search engines will bring you only the information you want.

NO POSSIBLE LINK BETWEEN CANCER AND CELLPHONE

The recent study released by Danish scientists on the long-debated topic of whether cellphones are essentially a factor in causing cancer to people/animals vindicates its long held position on the topic. The research involved study of data on the whole Danish population aged above 30 between the period of 1990 to 2007. The whole Danish adult population was subdivided into subscribers and non-subscribers of mobile phones and followed up for incidence of cancer and other diseases. The detailed study found no evidence of any increased risk of brain or nervous system tumours / cancer among mobile phone subscribers
