✂ 200M INDIANS HAVE NO TV, PHONE OR RADIO

One-sixth of the country, or 200 million Indians, don't possess most basic assets like a transistor or television set, phone, vehicle of any kind or a computer. In three states Arunachal Pradesh, Nagaland and MP— close to a third of the households own none of these assets – says House listing and Housing Census.

Just one third of rural households own a TV set, while more than 75% of urban households own one. TV penetration is highest in Delhi (88%), followed by Tamil Nadu (87%), Punjab, Chandigarh and Puducherry. Bihar has by far the lowest TV penetration of any state, at just 15%. 2011 is the first year the Census is counting mobile and landline use separately, and the numbers show that telephony in India is overwhelmingly about cellphones.

63% of households owned a phone, 53% owned a mobile phone only and another 6% owned both a landline and a mobile phone. Over half of rural households and three quarters of urban households now own a mobile phone. East and North-east India have low telephone density, with Chhattisgarh and Orissa being the country's worst. Delhi, Chandigarh, Goa, Lakshadweep and Kerala all have a tele-density close to 90%.

About 20% of urban households and 5% of rural households own a computer or laptop. Just 1% of rural households own a computer with internet, and 8% of urban households. Chandigarh, Delhi and Goa are the only states or union territories with household internet penetration above 10%; it is under 1% in Bihar.

✂ Governance Not Our Job Alone: Survey

The Economic Survey 2011-12 says that civil society and citizens play a key role in fostering economic growth. It says, "Honesty, punctuality, the propensity to keep promises, the attitude towards corruption are matters shaped in great part by norms and social beliefs and the behaviour patterns can become habitual. Moreover, in a democracy like India, what can be done by government depends in great measure on how ordinary people think and what people believe in."
